			Abstract: We provide the case for the introduction of "I don't know" answer in predictive modelling when a human needs to make a decision. We discuss the costs and potential benefits of its introduction. Colloquially, we have used the term "I don't know", but formally we refer to it as NotAvailable. A procedure to define NotAvailable predictions in binary classifiers, called all leave-one-out models (ALOOM), is presented as proof of the concept.
